

Latinos and the 2008 Elections

While many journalists, politicians, and pundits are discussing Latino population growth, its implications for elections and politics in the United States are not well understood. This conference therefore brings together scholars from across the United States to assess the impact of the Latino vote in the 2008 elections. They will discuss state-level results as well as more thematic topics.

Immigration and Political Psychology

This conference is built around two key questions: 1) How can political psychology help us understand immigration attitudes in varying political contexts, and 2) Can insights from political psychology be used to help explain immigrants' attitudes?

The conference brings together scholars who examine these questions across regional and racial differences in the United States and Europe.

CONFERENCES

Latinos and the 2008 Elections

April 24-25, 2009

Begins at 9:30 a.m. in BAT 5.108

Sponsored by the Public Policy Institute
& the Department of Government

Immigration and Political Psychology

April 24, 2009

9:30 a.m. in the Texas Union, Room 4.110

Sponsored by the Donald D. Harrington Fellows Program
& the Department of Government